Fund Managers Comments

As at 29 January 2021

Market review

After a strong finish to 2020, global equities struggled to make further gains in January as rising expectations of further US fiscal stimulus were offset by profit-taking on valuation concerns. Success in the Georgia run-off election by the Democrats gives the incoming Joe Biden administration a stronger mandate for broader fiscal stimulus measures which led to a rise in US bond yields and favoured reflationary strategies in the equity market. High-profile speculative retail investor activity centred around Reddit Forum users trading shares such as GameStop on the Robinhood app appeared to dampen institutional investor risk appetite towards month end.

Despite a weak start to the year on news, large parts of Japan entered a new state of emergency in order to control COVID-19 infection rates and the TOPIX managed to close the month marginally higher. The influence of the US election and resulting stimulus expectations were evident in market factor trends with a notable shift in favour of return reversal, value and yield strategies. At a sector level, leadership was more ambiguous with oil-related shares leading and steels, shippers and autos among the weakest areas. Elsewhere, technology shares remained in vogue on reports of semiconductor shortages in the auto industry while smaller companies continued to lag the broader market.

Performance

The JPY S Share Class rose 1.9% versus a 0.2% increase in the TOPIX Total Return Index over the period. Clearly the shift in market leadership towards undervalued shares supported portfolio performance, however the ongoing underperformance of small caps remained a headwind. Relative outperformance was mainly driven by stock selection with notable success within information and communications (TV Asahi Holdings), precisions (Nikon) and services (Secom Joshinetsu) only partially offset by problems within construction (Mirait Holdings), metal products (Topre) and technology (Cosel). Sector allocation was broadly neutral with the benefit from our overweight in rubber products (tyres) offset by continued outperformance of technology where we are underweight.

Portfolio turnover

Medikit: we elected to return to Medikit, a niche medical device manufacturer, given pronounced relative share price weakness since we sold our holding in August 2019. The business was somewhat impacted by the pandemic in 2020 but we expect a full recovery once hospitals return to normal activity levels post-COVID-19. The shares currently trade on 5x EV/EBITDA, with 50% of the market cap covered by net cash, a steep discount to the medical device sector's average valuation.

Benesse Holdings: a new position was taken in Benesse Holdings, a provider of education services, language schools and senior care homes, following a sharp derating of valuations. We believe the core education and senior home businesses will make a V-shaped recovery in the years ahead and await further action from management on the lossmaking language school business. Given the current depressed share price level, we also believe it is likely management will use their high cash reserves to conduct a share buyback in 2021.

Denso: the holding in Denso was sold as it approached our fair value target. Positive investor sentiment on the acceleration of penetration of electric vehicles and hybrid cars lead to Denso's share price doubling versus March 2020 lows. We agree the company is well positioned for the major technology transition occurring in the auto sector but would argue most of the good news is already discounted in the share price in the short term.

JAFCO: JAFCO, a leading Japanese venture capital business, was sold on share price strength as it achieved our target price level. Despite buoyant markets, the company has failed to generate significant gains this year given limited IPO activity within their portfolio of holdings, with the large unrealised gain on their holding in Nomura Research Institute a more significant driver of the share price.

NTT Data: Since the nadir of the pandemic-induced market selloff in April, its share price has subsequently risen around 50%. Given the parent company NTT appears less likely to buy in NTT Data, having recently acquired 100% of NTT Docomo, and with the government's plans for greater digitalisation of service already discounted, we decided to recycle the funds in NTT Data into higher conviction ideas including increased weightings in their smaller peers, NS Solutions and DTS.

Outlook and strategy

Global equity markets appear to be looking through the current surge in worldwide coronavirus cases, despite the risk of a double dip in economic activity, given the prospects of a continuation of supportive monetary and fiscal policies until well after vaccine distribution has hopefully achieved herd immunity. Given President Biden's aggressive plans for further fiscal stimulus and developed world consumers' high savings rates in 2020 it is possible the world economy could enter another period of synchronised global growth in late 2021/early 2022 as pent-up demand is unleashed offering a very supportive environment for corporate profits.

At the time of writing, we are in the middle of the third quarter earnings season in Japan with results to date clearly surprising to the upside although share price reactions have been somewhat muted. The manufacturing sector appears to be leading the recovery in corporate profits with technology earnings at all-time highs in many cases and the auto sector generally positively surprising in terms of cost-cutting measures and operational leverage to the recovery in production volumes. The non-manufacturing sector is more exposed to the negative impact of social distancing measures so is likely to be more reliant on a successful vaccination programme allowing a full return to normal life later in the year. The Japanese government have decided to extend the current state of emergency through to early March and plans to start vaccination of healthcare personnel in the middle of February.

Portfolio turnover this month focused on profit-taking in winning shares which appeared more fully valued after a period of strong share price performance, with proceeds recycled into laggards more reliant on a full normalisation of economic activity to return profits to previous peak levels. We continue to believe the current portfolio offers broad exposure to an economic recovery at exceptional valuation levels given the unusual level of herding by investors in highly valued, quality large-cap shares in 2020.
