Fund Manager's Comments

The portfolio returned 6.3% (1 US$ Share Class) in March versus 4.3% for the Fund's benchmark, the NASDAQ Biotechnology Net TR Index (NBI), for a relative outperformance of 2.0%. The biotechnology sector outperformed the broader market, with the S&P 500 Index up 3.7% (all figures in dollar terms).

Sector review

The month started weakly for both the biotechnology sector and the broader market, continuing the trend in place since the start of the year, however the last two weeks of March were characterised by a robust rally. While this seems to have lifted investor sentiment above the recently mounting despondency, most investors appear to be wary, concerned that the move higher could be just a temporary bear market rally driven more by quantitative strategies responding to short-term oversold technical trends and excessively bearish positioning, rather than reflecting the restart of the long-term bull market for risk assets. Certainly the Fed's projected path for interest rate increases over the balance of the year, as well as quantitative tightening, not to mention the war in Ukraine, has investors remaining cautious on risk assets for the time being. Within the biotechnology sector, clinical development and regulatory news flow continues to trend in mixed fashion, and investors continue to wait impatiently for the much-anticipated M&A activity to pick up and reinvigorate broader investor interest.

Notwithstanding the broader macroeconomic picture, we remain increasingly constructive on biotechnology, at least for those companies at more advanced stages of development that might reasonably be labelled as "quality defensive growth". Putting aside the late-March rally, we continue to see growing investor interest towards larger-cap, commercial-stage companies, particularly revenue growth-stage companies with robust new product cycles, R&D pipeline potential and M&A optionality. With investors increasingly contemplating an environment characterised by aggressive inflation but at the same time slowing economic growth – stagflation – we believe investor sentiment towards pharmaceutical and larger biotechnology companies seems to be firming particularly as, at the margin, healthcare reform legislative impasse in Washington is providing some comfort on the drug pricing environment for the coming few years.

We feel the transition from a pandemic to endemic phase for COVID-19's evolution and epidemiology will drive a normalisation of prescription drug trends. Especially for companies selling medicines for chronic illnesses, as well as those attempting to garner physician and patient attention early in their product launch cycles, this could create a robust environment for a beat-and-raise dynamic to be established versus investor expectations. In turn, this could be a positive for commercial-stage bio-pharma stories in the context of a macroeconomic environment characterised by inflation but perhaps also moderating growth.

Outlook

Meanwhile, at the earlier end of the biotechnology company spectrum, we continue to be wary. While the share price performance of many recent IPOs as well as concept technology stories has been truly terrible over the past 12 months, we continue to be sceptical that this segment of the sector can sustain anything more than just a temporary recovery. Apart from the issue of the tightening macro environment, which is sucking a great deal of the oxygen from the room for risk assets, our main issue is more structural. We feel the record-breaking IPO and equity issuance for the sector over the past couple of years has stretched specialist capital very thin across a large number of early-stage unprofitable companies. Many of these appear to be attempts by specialist cross-over investors to game the recent appetite of the public markets for innovation and disruptive technologies, injecting significant capital into brand new corporate entities and flipping them public almost instantly. Many of these companies appear to be undifferentiated or are otherwise so early in their development that it is extremely hard to discern whether they have the credentials to create real medical breakthroughs with truly sustainable competitive advantage. For us, this stretching of risk-tolerant capital across early-stage companies in an intensely crowded and competitive environment is a bigger, stickier, pernicious issue for the sector that is likely to keep downward pressure on the share prices of earlier-stage companies in the near term, particularly given many of these companies will need to refinance over the next 12-24 months. With this in mind, we feel it is appropriate that the Fund's portfolio remains positioned more towards commercial-stage quality growth stories.
