Fund Managers Comments

As at 29 January 2021

The Polar Capital Global Convertible Fund returned -1.61% in January, taking its return since inception to 71.30% (USD I Acc Share Class). In comparison, the Refinitiv Global Focus Convertible Bond Index (in dollar terms) returned 0.01% and 55.14%, respectively.

The US occupied greatest share of mind in January, with the month perhaps best characterised as one in which democracy was thoroughly tested yet duly prevailed. Indeed, months of allegations by President Trump of mass voter fraud during the recent presidential election culminated in the storming of Capitol Hill by his most staunch supporters in an attempt to disrupt the confirmation of incoming President Joe Biden and as a demonstration of his supporter's denial of the election result. The sheer magnitude and swiftness of the degradation of the pillars of democracy with which this insurrection took place not only sent shockwaves across the political spectrum but also resulted in the prospect of Trump facing a historic second impeachment trial for his role in inciting and encouraging the upheaval.

However, while the temporary collapse of democracy should not be understated, nor should the subsequent victory of democracy be ignored. Indeed, it is testament to the strength of democracy in the region that Biden was confirmed shortly after these events unfolded and was sworn in a few days later, on the steps of Capitol Hill, with little disruption.

Indeed, despite the symbolism of this momentary constitutional breakdown, financial markets appeared largely unphased, likely because it was just that. Momentary. In addition, while the abovementioned events presented some level of uncertainty, other political events served to provide more certainty during the month, namely the outcome of the Georgia run-off elections which confirmed Democrats gaining control of all three branches of government, albeit by the slimmest of margins. While this does not enable Biden to roll out his policy agenda freely, it presents a narrow path for Democrats to enact certain measures with a simple majority, including additional stimulus relief. With personal disposable income and the consumer savings rate in the US at already elevated levels following the previous round of fiscal stimulus, a further boost to this is widely foreseen as likely to facilitate a significant boost in overall consumer spending in the months ahead. This acknowledgment of potential strong upcoming consumer spending led to higher inflation expectations and contributed to a further steepening in the US yield curve to levels not seen since 2017.

The other notable event of January was the rise and realisation of the power of the retail investor. Specifically, by engaging in a concerted effort to target heavily shorted stocks, this class of investor not only caused meaningful losses to some hedge funds caught in their crosshairs, but stoked consternation within the hedge fund community at large, consequently causing them to reassess the convictions of their short positions. As a result, this institutional investor base withdrew their risk exposure en masse, resulting in a broad-based de-grossing, the outcome of which was weaker financial markets and much elevated volatility into month end (VIX Index +10.3pts to 33.1%).

Against this backdrop, convertibles performed well in January, as did the level of new convertible issuance. Regarding the latter, $12.6bn was priced across 30 deals, close to double the historical average for January since 2012 (source: BAML). The US region contributed the most to convertible new issuance, with $5.3bn followed by Asia, Europe and Japan at $5.1bn, $1.8bn, and $0.5bn, respectively.

Fund performance was mixed in January, as we benefitted from some areas, including renewable energy, but suffered in others, such as transportation and utilities. The largest contributor to fund performance was renewable energy equipment manufacturer Maxeon Solar Technologies as the company received several positive sell-side reviews during the month combined with confirmation that the Democrats had taken control of the Senate, the latter of which raises the possibility of a more policy-friendly environment for the company in the years ahead. Conversely, the largest detractor to fund performance during the month came from French utility company EDF as the stock reversed its recent positive performance as restructuring talks with the French government appeared to be delayed. We reduced the size of the Fund's position during the month.

Looking ahead, we foresee ongoing partisan politics, continued high COVID-19 cases and related global restrictions both on businesses and consumers as headwinds. However, early vaccine deployments combined with ongoing fiscal stimulus and monetary accommodation are shining an ever-brighter light on the outlook towards the middle of the year. That being said, the pace of vaccine deployments remains highly varied, with the UK and US doing well and Europe largely lagging behind. Taken together, we believe these competing factors are likely to keep volatility higher rather than suppressed in the near term, along with the prospect of exiting the pandemic with a two-speed global growth rate as faster vaccine deployment enables some nations to emerge from restrictions sooner than others.

With this in mind, we continue to aim to create a portfolio with a solid credit backstop to mitigate downside risk coupled with upside participation potential. We remain optimistic in the outlook for the Fund.
