Market review

The year got off to an explosive start and, despite a sharp correction in the last week of January, emerging markets continued to outperform, registering a further increase of 3.1% during the month. Early in January, markets were turbocharged by the Democrats winning control of the Senate in the US presidential election, bringing hopes of even greater fiscal stimulus as well as the success of vaccines completing phase 3 trials. This, at least temporarily, pushed aside concerns over stretched valuations. However, the severity of the second wave, the number of new variants of coronavirus as well as the realisation that ramping up vaccine production was likely to be complicated all contrived to rein in the exuberance. The pullback was exacerbated by hedge fund de-grossing in response to the massive short-squeeze from retail investors.

Emerging markets rose the fastest and corrected the most during January. They also experienced a similar rotation to that seen elsewhere, namely from value, which had been leading since early November, back to growth, as fears of extended lockdowns spread. Asia continued to benefit both from its superior response to the pandemic and its sectoral breakdown which heavily favours growth over cyclicals and ended the month 4.2% higher, led by the north Asian markets of China, Korea and Taiwan. This compares with a fall of 6.8% in Latin America and a rise of 1.1% in EMEA. Latin America suffered from currency weakness as well as having a high weighting in commodity stocks.

Sectorally, January was a curious month. The price of Brent rose over 6.2% and yet the energy sector was one of five that registered falls during the month alongside materials, utilities, financials and consumer staples. The only three sectors that outperformed were consumer discretionary, largely due to strong rises in both Alibaba Group Holdings and Meituan Dianping, communications services, predominantly due to the 20% surge in Tencent, and information technology.

Fund performance

The Fund posted a rise of 0.9%, lagging the benchmark although ahead of the high dividend index. The underperformance was almost entirely due to performance in Korea and China although the overweight in the former and underweight in the latter was also a contributor. In Korea, relatively defensive, higher yielding holdings such as KT&G Corp and KT Corp as well as financials had a poor month while the focus was very much on electric vehicles and technology. For once, however, Samsung Electronics underperformed while newly purchased Hyundai Motor Company rose over 20% in January. In China it was a similar story with performance dominated by high growth large-cap companies notably Tencent, Alibaba Group Holdings and Meituan Dianping. A number of holdings performed very strongly, such as Haier Electronics, TopSports International and China Merchants Bank but this was offset by large falls in Minth Group, a reaction to its strong run-up last year rather than any negative developments, and weakness in the defensive growth names such as Guangdong Investment.

Elsewhere, performance was okay albeit the positive of being underweight in Latin America was outweighed by the negative of being overweight in EMEA. Country performance was good in India, Russia, the UAE, South Africa, the Czech Republic and Romania and that was more than enough to offset the underperformance in Kuwait, Mexico and Indonesia.

Activity

There were two new purchases in Korea, LG Corp and Hyundai Motor Company. LG Corp is a holding company which has started the process of rationalisation by spinning out loss-making businesses both at the holding company level and at its subsidiaries. Despite this, and the fact that its underlying businesses are performing exceptionally well, the discount to net asset value has widened to over 60% from a historical average of 45%. Hyundai Motor Company will benefit from the global economic recovery as well as a slate of new models skewed towards SUVs and the higher end of the market where margins are higher. In addition, the company has a high exposure to electric vehicles and is a relative pioneer in hydrogen fuel cells for which they get little credit. The preference shares have widened to a discount of over 50% which compares with a three-year average closer to 40%. The discount widened after the interim dividend was cut last year but it should be restored again in June.

There were two purchases in China, China Lesso Group Holdings and Ping An Insurance. China Lesso Group Holdings is the market leader in the production of plastic pipes with nationwide distribution, is a direct beneficiary of infrastructure growth, was acquired at 8x 1yr forward earnings for mid to high-teens earnings growth CAGR and a rising dividend pay-out ratio from 30% to 50% over the next three years as the capex cycle reduces.

Ping An Insurance, the Chinese life and health insurance company is trading at a discount to its long-term average given the impact COVID-19 had on its new business growth in 2020 due to restrictions on its agency sales force while its banking and technology arms have continued to perform well. We purchased the high return business for less than 9x forward earnings as 2021 will see a return to growth and a double-digit earnings CAGR over the next three years, with a dividend yield of nearly 3%.

NHPC the Indian hydro power producer was acquired at 0.7x p/b, yielding over 6%, and with its receivables issues cleared and nearing an inflection point on capacity additions over the next two years, it should see strong earnings growth and re-rating over the same period.

These were funded both through a reduction in the Fund's ex-Asia weighting through the sale of both AB Ignitis Grupe and Inter Rao, as well as the partial sales of the more defensive positions in Korea such as KT&G Corp, KT Corp and Lotte REIT.

Outlook

January's performance of emerging markets suggests they should continue to outperform. The optimistic scenario for 2021 revolves around a strong global recovery and a weaker dollar which should favour emerging markets given they continue to be a more cyclical asset class than developed markets. However, in January the dollar strengthened, China tightened monetary policy and lockdowns became more widespread in developed markets, all of which might have counted against the asset class. That emerging markets outperformed by such a large degree against such an unpromising backdrop bodes well for the rest of the year.

Fund Managers Comments

As at 29 January 2021

Despite rising doubts in January, a strong economic growth narrative is by far the most likely for the rest of the year. The vaccine rollout may have been slower than expected in some areas, notably Europe, but it is happening and the evidence suggests transmission is falling rapidly. Moreover, an increasing number of vaccines have become available with more in the pipeline. The economic data in areas where the second wave has been at its worst have been far better than in the first wave and in many instances economic growth has not been interrupted. This all augurs well for continued upwards earnings revisions both for 2021 and 2022 which will be required given that emerging market valuations, as elsewhere, have become elevated relative to historical averages.
